Defying Gravity in Testing

@Brainstormer What consistency concepts can be applied when an admin and a normal user panel edit their panels at the same time?

Good point—testing concurrent admin and user edits of remaining slots and status badges matters.

Here's a real example: in corporate calendar/meeting-room booking (employees and IT admins trying to schedule rooms for meetings), organizers reserve rooms that have capacity and start/end times, and admins can place holds or override room availability. There's a hard cutoff around meeting start times and scarce resources (rooms with specific capacities and equipment). Ownership lives with the meeting organizer until an admin overrides. People often see a room as "available" in their calendar while another actor has a pending hold; the typical symptom is "shows free here, booking rejected there." Teams analyze it by identifying invariants (one owner per slot), visibility windows, and reconciliation boundaries between views and the authoritative assignment.

In your system, what is the equivalent (which actor owns the class state and remaining slots/status badge), and how would you resolve the observable race condition between admin and regular user edits?
